the way Griffith puts it.

The most pleasing part of today's battle was the manner in which Jay Carl Cashion acted during his five-inning servitude on the mound. Cashion was not only due to the mound. Cashion was not only care base on the catholic University ball club yesterday.

Jim Shaw's control was not quite so good, but when he did get the ball over the plate, few liberties were taken. Shaw struck out six of the enemy in four struck out six of the enemy in four struck out six of the enemy in four strucks. It was Jim's wildness in the eighth, when he walked Burns with the bases full, that gave the International Leaguers their only run.

Billy Burke, a little southpaw, relieved Mays when the sixth opened, and Burke's pass to Foster proved fatal, as Milan smashed to deep left for a triple. Messrs. Mays and Burke, the Providence slabmen, also came through with dirst-class pitching. Five hits off the pair was the Nationals' portion. Had these men been accorded the perfect support with which the American Leaguers backed up Cashion and Shaw, the score would have been something like 2 to 1. With Washington on the long end.

The Griff clan played smart baseball, taking advantage of every slip up by the opposition. The ice broken in the second inning, when Morgan singled to right, reached second on Shean's fumble of Shank's grounder, and scored when Shanks, making a bluff to stefal, caused Kocher to heave the ball into center field.

That's the way they announce the batteries up here, and this cry will be megaphoned to 30,000 fans and fanettes in Fenway Park tomorrow afternoon, when the Griffmen and Red Sox clash in the opening game of the season.

Boston tonight is baseball mad. More than a thousand fanstormed the back bay station to greet the Washington players when they alighted from the Providence train, and the players were forced to walk single file through the mob.

"The Red Sox is going to beat youse tomorrow," shouted a newshoy as he caught Walter Johnson's eye. "Don't be too sure, son, replied the great twirler with a smile, "My ball club is ready. We are
